

celebrated for his piety, learning, and the number of books he has given to the world. This work falling into my hands, discovering that it was printed in Pittsburgh, I was a little surprised to find it so well executed, both in the engravings, of which it contains a number, and the printing. The quality of the paper was good, and I was told it was made at a paper-mill near Redstone. The printing of so very large a work in a new country, is a considerable undertaking, and it behoves the people to step forward and give all the encouragement they can to the enterprise. On further inquiry, I found there had been a large subscription obtained for the work, among the religious of all denominations.

Passing on to Wheeling, on the Ohio, in Virginia, also a flourishing place, and putting up at an inn, the first thing that struck me was a paper lying on the table, called "The Wheeling Repository," printed in a quarto form. A little astonished, I exclaimed, "What! a press here too!" I was pleased, to discover that the paper was neatly printed. It contained a good deal of entertaining and original matter, and poetry that bespoke its author to possess some of the sparks of the "poetic fire" of a Shakespeare. When we consider the expensiveness of printing materials and labour, the small amount required by individuals, and the great number who do not support newspapers, the establishment of a printer certainly denotes a good degree of population and prosperity. Happy country! thought I.—Europe knows but little of your excellence.—little of the virtue and genius of your sons. Could I at a tho't, I would transport thousands of the children of wretchedness of the old world to this best and happiest of countries—where it is the business of the whole community to make each other happy—where laws are mild, equal, and just—where lands are good, cheap, and easy of culture—where all the necessities of life are cheap and plenty. Could I impress these things on the minds of the people of Europe, I would preach daily the words of the venerable Dr. Franklin—"Where liberty dwells, there is my country."

SIX DOLLARS REWARD.

Strayed away from the subscriber, about the 20th of April last,

A dark brown Mare Colt, three years old, the only mark now recollected, is a small snip on the centre of her nose. She had been shod before, but had only one shoe on when she went away. The hair was cut short off her tail, but she was never dock'd. The above reward and reasonable charges will be given, to any person who will bring her home, or give information where she may be found.
